SO LONG, Southwest? Boeing Field beckons Potential move from Sea-Tac fits airline. Politicians and rival airlines could block the carrier's plans, but a move to Boeing Field matches Southwest Airlines' business model.

TEXT:

When Boeing Field Director Bob Burke was an executive with Stewart International Airport north of New York City several years ago, he played a key role in an ultimately unsuccessful effort to persuade Southwest Airlines to make Stewart its New York-area destination.

Now Burke has another chance at Southwest.

The airline initiated talks more than a year ago with Burke and others to move its Puget Sound-area destination to Boeing Field from Sea-Tac Airport. The existence of those talks was made public last month.

Will Burke strike out again, or will Southwest - Sea-Tac's fourth-largest airline tenant - make the move to the Seattle airfield that Burke manages?

Burke didn't initiate the conversation with Southwest, but he is aggressively pursuing the airline's interest.

He makes the case that Boeing Field almost perfectly fits the airport profile Southwest has used to its advantage around the country. The airline, the nation's most profitable, avoids such high-cost airports as San Francisco and Denver while serving cheaper fields, such as Oakland, Houston's Hobby Airport, Dallas' Love Field and Chicago's Midway Airport.

Southwest is expected to make a more specific proposal to King County before the end of the month. It's expected to contain Southwest's plan to expand Boeing Field's terminal and parking and its plan to pay for those improvements.
