TEXT:
At odds for half a century, two bitter enemies confront each other at close range, both heavily armed, neither willing to back down. That was the situation facing President Clinton as he flew off last Saturday on his visit to India and Pakistan. But an even more urgent example of an old rivalry fraught with fresh risks awaited his attention on the other side of Asia. In a close election, Taiwan challenged the communist rulers of mainland China by voting a pro-independence party into power.

/TX

The Taiwanese election disrupted the status quo on several fronts. It represented the most serious threat yet to the principle, officially honored in both Washington and Beijing, that Taiwan is just a wayward province of China, destined for eventual reunification. The vote also set in motion the first democratic transfer of power in China's 5,000-year history. And it ended more than 50 years of unbroken rule by the Kuomintang (KMT), the once iron-fisted regime of Chiang Kai-shek and his Nationalist exiles. Last week's victor was Chen Shui-bian, 49, the son of a poor farmer and leader of a party that favors independence from China. Only three days before the vote, Chen reacted to a warlike warning from Beijing by insisting: "Taiwan is an independent, sovereign country. It is not a part of the People's Republic of China.

Washington and Beijing disagreed. Clinton reaffirmed America's longstanding "one China" policy and urged "both sides to reach out and resolve their differences peacefully through dialogue." Beijing wasn't reaching out.

But before it passes the tariff bill, Congress may demand a concession from Clinton--most likely the sale to Taiwan of the four Aegis-class antimissile cruisers it has requested. "It's very important to show strong support for Taiwan," says James Lilley, a former U.S. ambassador to China. The key to maintaining peace, he says, is "not to let the Chinese dictate the terms." But for both Washington and Taipei, standing up to China will be a risky business.
